Operating heavy vehicles at high speeds and in remote locations require reliable, high voltage systems. In these applications, the high voltage battery pack must be capable of operating in a harsh environment where the quality of the available power sources may be questionable. Additionally, these systems are subject to harsh electromagnetic interference (EMI) conditions which can render operation of the vehicle system unreliable. Battery-based systems typically include heavy lead plates or rubber impregnated with liquid electrolyte. Lead is susceptible to poisoning and breakdown, particularly in the field of high temperature or high performance vehicles. Besides the environmental hazards posed by lead, lead plates or rubber are relatively heavy and cumbersome, and they are usually single unit units (single cell batteries). When a battery is functioning properly, it generates a high internal resistance which makes discharge of the battery relatively slow. There is a need for an improved battery pack to overcome these and other problems.In many image/audio/video coding systems, a picture or frame is represented by a sequence of pictures, and the picture may be divided into blocks before encoding. In video coding, data for each block may be encoded once or multiple times. In general, video frames may be partitioned into nonoverlapping macroblocks. For each partitioned macroblock, a respective encoded (compressed) block may be selected for transmission, and/or a respective encoded (compressed) block may be selected for storage and/or use as reference for motion compensation (MC) blocks or other blocks, depending on video coding standards. Different areas of a picture may have different characteristics. For example, an area on a picture, such as a picture edge, may have different characteristics than an area in the middle of the picture. Similarly, a video frame may also include different areas with different characteristics, such as a screen region, a motion-compensated region, a foreground region, a background region, or a region with a sparse texture or complex illumination. Due to the foregoing, a disparity may exist between the encoder and the decoder as to the region of interest (ROI) for each block. For example, the encoder may focus on encoding a specific ROI, such as a moving object or relevant audio/video content, in a video frame, and may not encode other unnecessary areas in the video frame or perform MC operation on MC blocks in other areas in the video frame. The selection of which block to encode a partitioned block depends on a number of factors, such as motion characteristics and/
